Digital preservation is different, because it involves active management over time. If you scan and then forget about the digital file, it may not be usable to future users. You have to look at it as a long term commitment. Think of it in terms of our orphaned data being adopted by a loving digital preservation department somewhere.

Digitization is Different than Digital Preservation: Help ...
Digitizing the information contained in paper documents is the first essential step in a digital renewal process. Without it, continuity between an organization's past and future can be compromised and its historic memory lost. Digital archiving is the technical process by which a paper original is converted into electronic format and indexed.

Digital archives aren't immune to preservation's ethical issues. Quite the opposite! Digital files can degrade over time (aka bit rot), and digital storage is vulnerable to technical failures and obsolescence (old storage technology gets upgraded and files need to be moved to new storage). As a result, archivists are obligated to have a more active and iterative role in preservation over time than they would with paper materials.
